Preventing a Crisis

When a loved one has memory loss, you need to be prepared for anything. In the event a natural disaster or a wandering occurs, stand ready with these tips.

- Make sure neighbors know about your loved one's memory loss in case they wander. Talk to them ahead of time to ensure they know your phone number and can alert you if they ever see your loved one alone.
- Equip the home with batteries, flashlights, an emergency radio, and water and food supplies in the event of a bad storm or power outage. Don't forget to pack some extra comfort items for your loved one.
- In case your loved one has a medical emergency, have an emergency contact list as well as medical documents and insurance cards in an easy to locate place. In the event you need to grab them, this will be quicker than trying to find everything you need.

Planning Ahead

While your loved one's memory loss may not be too profound just yet, it's never too early to plan for future care or legal matters. Consider these points to make the future just a little easier.

- Meet with an elder law attorney to get your loved one's wishes detailed in a will. Establishing a power of attorney is also a good idea.
- Make some important financial decisions, such as how you'll pay for future care and medical needs.
- Tour memory care communities in order to find the perfect fit for your loved one. Getting their input can help you feel like you are making the best possible decision for them. Having a plan can help you feel more prepared and secure just in case a crisis or quick turn of health would occur.
